Prior to issuing a sub-award, the Organization reviews and approves sub-grantee requests and budgets. During the grant term, program staff provide ongoing oversight through regular communication and periodic check-ins, and sub-grantees submit required programmatic and financial reports. These reports are reviewed to confirm progress toward grant objectives and that expenditures align with the approved budget and intended charitable purposes; issues are documented and addressed through follow-up and, when necessary, modifications to the sub-grant agreement.

The program has expanded to address the needs at a village level, reaching approximately 14,000 households, by providing financial support and technical assistance to 60 villages bordering Volcanoes National Park as they design and launch livelihood initiatives for a climate-resilient future. Community programs also focused on educational outreach and access through nature clubs, conservation camps and debates, guided tours, forest visits, teacher training and community leader engagement. The Girls in Conservation project addresses education inequalities by supporting girls in their education goals through academic scholarships to secondary schools and promoting environmental stewardship. To build scientific capacity, the Fossey Fund provided training to more than 500 university students and has hosted 25 workshops with participants from more than 30 countries. The Fossey Fund has an intensive mentoring program for early-career scientists and provides scholarships to promote the educational advancement of African scientists, with a particular focus on women in science and conservation.

Additional activities include biodiversity research, training early-career Congolese scientists, and supporting sustainable livelihoods, education, food security, and women's empowerment initiatives to reduce pressure on forests.
